Journal Information

Aims and Scope

Recognizing that research in human biology must be founded on a comparative knowledge of our closest relatives, this journal is the natural scientist's ideal means of access to the best of current primate research. Folia Primatologica covers fields as diverse as molecular biology and social behaviour, and features articles on ecology, conservation, palaeontology, systematics and functional anatomy. In-depth articles and invited reviews are contributed by the world's leading primatologists. In addition, special issues provide rapid peer-reviewed publication of conference proceedings. Folia Primatologica is one of the top-rated primatology publications and is acknowledged worldwide as a core journal for primatologists, zoologists and anthropologists.

For over 50 years, primatologists have conducted studies in the wild on Madagascar's ring-tailed Lemur catta, one of the best-known primate species. These varied studies have covered topics ranging from behaviour to biology, ecology, genetics and palaeobiology.

This Folia Primatologica special topic issue takes that research a step further by not only adding to our knowledge of L. catta in gallery and dry forest habitats such as Beza Mahafaly or Berenty, but by also discussing populations residing at high altitude, in spiny thicket, on rocky outcrops and in anthropogenically disturbed coastal habitats. The contributors comprise not only long-established experts in this field, but also a new generation of scientists dedicated to furthering our understanding of this important primate species. In addition to exploring behavioural and ecological aspects in detail, this issue also offers an update on ring-tailed lemur life history, morphology, genetics and cognition.

This new peer-reviewed online-only journal publishes original case reports covering the entire spectrum of neurology. Clinicians and researchers are given a tool to disseminate their personal experience to a wider public as well as to review interesting cases encountered by colleagues all over the world. To complement the contributions supplementary material is welcomed.

The reports are searchable according to the key words supplied by the authors; it will thus be possible to search across the entire growing collection of case reports with universally used terms, further facilitating the retrieval of specific information. Following the open access principle, the entire contents can be retrieved at no charge, guaranteeing easy access to this valuable source of anecdotal information at all times.

The outstanding feature of this publication is its dual engagement of natural and social science approaches to the discipline of primatology. Because of the increasingly anthropogenic environments in which primates live, primatologists need to expand their methodological toolkit in order to understand the behaviors, motivations, and cultural conceptualizations of the people who interact with primates.

The studies presented here encompass a range of methods and research frameworks and illustrate some of the diverse ways that ethnographic approaches can deepen our understanding of the lived experiences of our conspecifics and primate cousins. By actively including humans as part of primates' "natural" environments and thus part of our research designs, primatologists are better able to develop effective coexistence strategies.

This publication is essential reading for primatologists focusing on human-nonhuman primate relations and on primate management and conservation issues. It is also a valuable resource for anthropologists studying the human dimension of conservation, conservation scientists, and anyone interested in biosocial or interdisciplinary approaches to research.
